IT'S A NEW YEAR MAKE IT A GREAT ONE!

Q. I have a full size 2007 Ford van outfitted with hand controls. Sometimes I experience weakness in my shoulders and have a hard time negotiating turns. I have heard that you can have the steering pump machined out which would allow you to turn the steering wheel with little effort. Do you know where I can find instructions on doing this modification? Rob. W.-VA.

A. Rob, I have an answer but it does not involve you doing any of the work. LOW effort or NO effort steering is a modification that should and can only be done by a qualified expert. Yes, the procedure does involve enlarging the orifice of the steering pump but much more goes into the engineering of the complete system in order for it to meet strict safety guidelines. Case in point, you would never want just a low effort steering system without a backup system installed. Let's say you are driving down the interstate and you're fan belt breaks. You would immediately find that steering the van becomes impossible because the pump no longer works and you don't have the strength to force the wheel to turn. All low effort and no effort steering systems are installed with an electric backup system which will kick in with a toggle switch if the power steering pump quits working. This would allow you to easily turn the steering wheel in an emergency situation. Both systems have to be installed and crossed checked for safety reasons. However, first things first, and I warn others that are thinking about driver modifications, you MUST be evaluated by a Certified Driving Professional before you can have the modification installed.

Q. I have a temporary ramp out the front door or my house. It is made of aluminum and works well and I can pick it up and take it down easily. What I am looking for is a small ramp for the patio door going from the inside out. It is only a 1" rise and I do not want something permanent, or metal to scare up my floor. What do you suggest?? Liz W.-Va

A. Liz, there is a very good hard rubber threshold ramp sold by EZ Access. It stays in place and can be cut to fit the width of the door. You should be able to find it at your local mobility store. There are also other types but I have had one of these in place since 2001 and it works and leaves no floor marks.

Q. I have tried to sell my brothers 2007 Ford van that was extensively converted by a local mobility dealer with computers on it so he could be independent and drive. The van was ordered with a lift and 9" lowered floor to accommodate his tall chair. The total cost of the van with all the adaptations was over $ 144,000.00. When I called several places that sell these vans, I was told that we would be lucky to get $40,000.00 for it. The van is in excellent condition with only 42,000 miles on it!! Am I unreasonable to believe the van is worth much more than $40,000.00?

Carrie B.-Va.

A. Carrie it sounds like you have a very specialized van built just for your bother to drive. High tech computer installation and maintenance adds significant cost to a van, NOT VALUE. The reason for this is personalization and liability on the second sale. All the equipment was added with your brother in mind. Unless there is someone out there with the same style of chair and driving requirements of your brother, then the driving equipment is of no value. I am surprised that the vendors you talked to did not explain that the driving equipment is not readily resalable and all that high tech equipment actually holds DOWN the value of the van. The next owner only sees a lowered floor, low mileage accessible van and thus values the van against others similar to it. The perspective customer also has to consider what it would cost to have the van reconfigured without the high tech driving adaptations, which can run into thousands of dollars, thus discounting the van even more. Also when selling a van like this on your own you are accepting some liability as to the working of the equipment on the van. Only a Certified Driving Rehab Specialist would and should train anyone using high tech equipment, don't attempt to offer ANY instruction on how to drive the van using the high tech equipment, it will result in injury to someone. Further more the next owner will have difficulty in maintaining the van unless there is a trained and certified high tech Mobility dealer close. NMEDA's web site can assist you in finding these types of dealers (www.nmeda.org) and I would suspect that these dealers would have a better chance of getting the top dollar out of your van. Now that I have given you all the negatives of trying to sell this type of van, you can probably see why the valuation is as low as it is compared to the cost. This will be a hard sell, but check the NMEDA site and make a few calls; you may find a good fit.

Accessible Recreation in West Virginia!

Although the calendar says January, spring and summer will be here soon enough, and it is never too early to start making travel plans. This month Disabled Dealer of VA & WV is featuring, "A Guide To Accessible Recreation In West Virginia". This publication was made possible by the support of the following organizations and individuals:

West Virginia Assistive Technology System
 West Virginia Division of Tourism
 West Virginia Division of Culture & History
 West Virginia Division of Natural Resources
 Community Living Initiatives Corporation
 RetireWV

Special thanks to Hannah Sites for her persistence, enthusiasm and patience. Thanks also to Margo Neal for her professional expertise and Therese Welsh for her past contributions.

West Virginia is fortunate to have many accessible locations where everyone including children, older adults and individuals with disabilities can have fun! You can find information on these attractions through various state agencies and on-line, but this Guide is an attempt to put as much information as possible in one place.

In addition to site listings, the Guide includes other information on travel in West Virginia, such as public and commercial transportation providers, medical equipment and supply vendors, 24-hour emergency care centers and dialysis centers. You also can find information on Convention and Visitor Bureaus, Visitor and Welcome Centers and Fairs and Festivals across the state. The Guide does not include restaurants, hotels or individual businesses unless the site has achieved some distinction or is associated with a tourist destination point.

To view "A Guide To Accessible Recreation In West Virginia", visit www.cedwvu.org and search under Publications.

Alternate formats are available. Please call 800-841-8436 to request Braille, audio tape, compact disk or a printed copy.
